Graduate Teacher Programme - Secondary

Places available in Modern Foreign Languages and Mathematics

If you have left the armed services after September 2010 or will have left the armed services before September 2012* you could train to be a teacher through the Graduate Teacher Programme (GTP) at the University of Worcester.

(will still be serving on or after September 2012, but in your resettlement period)*

Do you want to be employed by a school while you work to qualify as a teacher?

GTP at the University of Worcester:

- Has been graded an outstanding programme nationally (Ofsted 2010) and is amongst the very top providers for excellent employability
- Is a year-long training programme where trainees work as unqualified teachers while following an individual programme of teacher training
- Leads to Qualified Teacher Status (QTS), which allows you to work as a qualified teacher in any maintained school in England
- Generous bursaries
- Features high quality programmes and innovative teaching
- Works closely with schools to help you develop your individual strengths and involves you in taking responsibility for monitoring your own professional development
- Provides a supportive package of university sessions to meet individual needs

Course expectations include:

- A personal tutor within the university and named mentor in school to support your academic and personal development
- A gradual increase in teaching expectation building to independence in the classroom
- A needs analysis audit developed at the beginning of the course to identify strengths and areas for development.
- University sessions and school training throughout the year
